What you're doing well:

- The team must have all the resources to analyze and test a story before acceptance by the Product Owner. According to your response, your team looks well-prepared.

Where you're on track:

- It's good that you've taken training or coaching, but follow on coursework would be helpful now that you've had some experience.
- It's good that you are attempting to size your team's Stories. The team needs to know if the Story can be completed within the Sprint boundary. However, traditional methods are prone to larger error rates than relative sizing methods. Relative methods are more gut based, and because they are not as specific as traditional methods, tend to average out to better estimates.

What needs improvement:

- If your Scrum Master is writing the stories and you don't have a full-time Product Owner on your team to represent your customer, then your team is not experiencing all the benefits of scrum or agile practices. With agile, responsibility for priority and gathering clear product requirements shifts from a part-time Executive Sponsor and the Project Manager to a full-time Product Owner, where someone who represents the customer's requirements and priorities is a participating member of the team.
